THE S.S. BUCKFALUS SHORT OF COAL AND PROVISIONS.
(BY TELEGRAPH.)
ADELAIDE, SUNDAY.
The tug Adelaide, which was despatched to the relief of the steamer Buckfalus, which was reported on Wednesday to be short of coal and in want of provisions, 80 miles to the westward of the Cape, returned to Cape Town on Saturday, after an unsuccessful search for the distressed ship. The Adelaide left anchorage immediately on receipt of the news last Wednesday, and it was hoped that by picking up the men from the Buckfalus, and sailing about for two days the tug would reach Cape Town. The men who pulled to Cape Town with the news took 24 hours, and before the tug reached Cape Town some 50 hours had elapsed. The sale of the Buckfalus scarcely gave the vessel any chance, as in that time with the wind and sea, it had probably drifted a considerable distance. As no difficulty was expected in finding the Buckfalus, the Adelaide's supply of coal was not sufficient to last one week. She intended to pick up the Buckfalus off Cape Town, but on reaching the point the signal was given to proceed, as it was considered that there would be no difficulty in finding the boat. The tug had a rough time, and the weather was hazy, so that the search was a doubtful one. Every effort was made to pick up the vessel, but it was impossible to find her. ## SIR CHARLES DILKE'S NEW BOOK.

FROM ADVANCE SHEETS OF THE CHAPTER ON VICTORIA AND NEW SOUTH WALES, AND ON THE QUESTION OF IMPERIAL DEFENCE, IN SIR CHARLES DILKE'S FORTHCOMING BOOK, "THE PROBLEMS OF GREAT BRITAIN," THE FOLLOWING SUMMARY IS MADE:—

The group of colonies in Australia, Sir Charles says, offer a spectacle of the most remarkable development of our race, under peaceful conditions. Victoria, whose capital is the first city of the continent in soil and climate, is a healthy country for the white man. Sir Charles Dilke notes the changes during the last 20 years since he first wrote of the colony. Deadlocks, he says, are now at an end; the plutocracy has given way to the popular House in great matters. The land system has received an immense development, and payment of members has been an astonishing success. Social and political class feeling has all but disappeared. Democracy and State Socialism are completely triumphant. Consensus is qualified by distance. The small proprietors and workmen are the supporters of the existing social order. Victoria is the most interesting of the colonies and the most attractive, and an excellent leader in the present world. There is a great exaggeration as regards the extent of protection. The average Victorian duties are low as compared with the Crown colonies or Canada, being equal to only 11 per cent. Still they are the best markets for British goods. Melbourne under federation is likely to become the New York and Washington of Australia. As the result of more land legislation Victoria will be able to beat her neighbours with wheat exporting and wine growing. Taxation is directed against the large estates. The Democrats, but favour land and agricultural interests. The Victorian aristocrats will not listen to State landlordism. There is no objection to State interference, and State Socialism is in favour with all classes. He notes the success of the State management of railways, which are used for the public good, and for the management of public departments is highly eulogized, the Civil Service being a credit to the colony. The honesty of public men makes parliamentary money scandals all but unknown. Since the payment of members the Legislature has been the most honest of the world. He praises Mr. Deakin's irrigation scheme, and prophesies a great development of fruit and wine growing. Gippsland will, he thinks, produce the finest wines of Australia, and possibly of the world. Politics are largely controlled by individuals. The Colonial Government was successful, but he thinks that a severance of Conservatives and Liberals is likely to come soon. Mr. Gillies is the national leader of the House, bold and unhesitating, but with a remarkable intellectual power; not popular, but favourably respected. Mr. Deakin schemes against the Government with power and will, and will be the future Prime Minister of Federated Australia. Mr. Service is the eloquent and subtle orator of the Conservative party, but Sir Graham Berry is the best platform speaker. Mr. Justice Lighthelm is a current and hotly imperious, and the most considerable man in the colony. Conservatism, he says, is divided as to the future; but the Liberals are in favour of a single chamber and the political emancipation of women. By the action of the workers in Victoria political progress is being made. The federal instinct is stronger than in New South Wales. By the change of ground by the parties in the general election, the Ministry were blamed for their feeble policy. Australian loans are defeated. The general diffusion of wealth is a source of pride, and a source of pride. The separationists are an obscure and unimportant faction. He praises the soldiers and the volunteers. The Victorian army is a model for colonial defence and an admirable nucleus for an Australian federal army.

Sir Charles Dilke's chapter on New South Wales is what he and is a very important point. He marks of thorough revision, if not a change of opinion. The contrast between New South Wales and Victoria in many things strikes him as being very great. In Democracy the advantage of the older colony has not been so great as that of the younger, and in the most considerable New South Wales has not been so bold as Victoria. The graduated progressive succession duty introduced by Victoria in 1870 was not adopted by New South Wales in 1886. The two most important Acts of 1880 and the Crown Lands Act of 1884. In regard to land legislation, the example and necessity of providing for the unemployed led to an over-construction of national government. A demand for protection for the popular discontent was partially mitigated by a policy of public works. Land grants are still rigid, only to be permanently allayed by land legislation more radical than that of last year. Public works in the colonies are the only-valve for the large surplus of labour. The railways, the large number of State interference as in America or England. The assistance given to poor people is a source of corruption, and money is spent on roads and bridges for influencing votes in New South Wales. A widespread desire to nationalize the railways, and the people have not been longer than any in other country, are not yet comparatively successful, but are beneficial in opening up the interior and cheapening the transport of colonial produce. Immigration was diverted to public works instead of the cultivation of lands, and the labour of the colonies was not so much devoted to State expenditure. The suspension of public works leads to depression of trade, and the Government are chargeable with constructing public works in order to create work for the unemployed. The suspension of public works in the colonies is approved, as there is surplus labour already. The bulk of immigrants used the urban population, but do little benefit to the country. Melbourne is a free-trade colony, New South Wales is inclining more and more to protection. The people have a special objection to the tariff, and are advised to raise money by taxes rather than upon land sales as ordinary revenue. Protectionists are likely to be reinforced by those whose sole desire is that the colony shall pay her way. The Customs duties are the most important source of revenue. The growth of the colony is likely to be promoted by the jealousy of Victoria, who, with a smaller territory, bears an equal population, with an overflowing treasury, while New South Wales, with a proportionally smaller population, has a yearly deficit. Protection will in the end prevail. The railway population are largely influenced by a desire to relate on Victoria, while the richer classes prefer increased Customs duties to a property tax. The comparative trade and land systems of the two colonies are discussed at length, the general conclusion being that the advantages of Victoria are in competition with the older colony can only be retained by a more radical land system. In New South Wales there is less of interest in politics than in Victoria. Party is more highly organized in the latter, with the result that there is greater stability of Government. New South Wales is less proud of her Parliament than that of her old colony. The members are unfavourably contrasted with those of Victoria. They are less masters of detail, and more given to vague professions and appeals to feeling. Sir Henry Parkes, however, is an exception. He is a statesman, and has yet to be defined by his actions, and the question of Mr. Grant, a widow now resident in Scotland, has been left in abeyance. The committee of the relief fund will hold a meeting next week, and decide upon the best means of distributing the sum in their hands, which exceeds £200, among those affected
